A FIRST AT KEC

I was pleased to see the following in the Fall 1989 issue of "ACCC Community," the newsletter of ACCC:

Vancouver Community College has just installed Canada's first tapeless language lab at its King Edward Campus.

The new lab is manufactured by the Sony Corporation, an industry leader in advanced language lab technology. There are only six other similar facilities currently in operation in the United States.

The Sony ZL 10 system uses digital voice memory instead of the traditional audio tape cassettes, and offers students and instructors many advantages over current labs.

Digital audio technology means a recording signal is converted directly into computer data, instead of being transferred onto magnetic tape. That way sounds, words and sentences can be rapidly retrieved, repeated or re-arranged without awkwardly shuttling a tape machine back and forth. The technical quality of the voice reproduction is also very high with this new system.

This new technology allows a student to listen to any part of a lesson at random and make digital recordings in response. Two different lessons can be simultaneously placed in a master memory, which operates four times faster than traditional labs.

This ability to rapidly review and re-arrange material gives teachers and students a lot of flexibility during lessons. At the same time, the lab has all the usual features, including instructor monitoring, intercom, all call, pairing, etc.

"This new system represents a significant improvement in language lab technology," says Bruce MacLean, Director of Instructional Media Services for the college. "We're really pleased to be able to offer our students such quality learning opportunities."

MacLean also hopes VCC can share its experience with the new lab among other educational institutions.
